

A second chance at true love

Jessica was overjoyed; she never thought she would ever be in love again after Frank died. At first she thought Preston Giles, (the man whose company was supposed to be her first publisher) might be the one but, when it turned out that he wasn't as wonderful he seemed, it broke her heart. After that, she was afraid to give her heart away to anyone, until she met George Sutherland. Although she didn't want to admit it at first, even to herself, from the moment they met she was immediately attracted to him. He was kind, intelligent, charming, patient, good looking and such a gentleman. Whenever she was around him, he made her feel special. He made her feel so beautiful, so cherished, and so loved. No one had made her feel that way since Frank had passed away all those years ago. At first, it scared her to death because she was afraid of getting her heart broken again like she did the last time she started to give her heart away to another person. But, after a while, she finally realized that that meeting George was the best thing that had happened to her in a very long time. Then, when he proposed to her in front of his whole family on Christmas eve, she was so happy she wanted to cry. She never expected to get married again, but, from the moment he popped the question, she knew that that George was the love of her life now. Frank would always have a special place in her heart but, she knew that Frank wouldn't want her to be sad and lonely for the rest of her life, he would want her to be happy, and she felt that Frank would have approved of George. She couldn't wait for the wedding, which would take place in the spring, at the Browns hotel in London, England where they had first met. She felt happier than she had in a very long time. Someone had once told her that life was like a book, how true, and she couldn't wait to read the next chapter.

The End